Biography:

David Baldwin is a Senior Political Scientist at the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University and Wallach Professor of Political Science Emeritus at Columbia University. He is also an Affiliate at the Arnold A. Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies at Columbia University, where he served as Director from 1987 to 1994. He has held teaching appointments at Dartmouth College and at the London School of Economics and Political Science and served as a research fellow at Brookings Institution.

His research interests include international political economy, international relations theory, American foreign policy, and power analysis. He is the author or editor of 14 books and has contributed articles to the American Political Science Review, Journal of Politics, World Politics, International Organization, Journal of Conflict Resolution, International Security, Review of International Studies, and International Studies Quarterly.

Professor Baldwin was the founder and first chair of the Research Committee on Political Power of the International Political Science Association (IPSA). He recently completed a study of the concept of power in international relations theory entitled Power and International Relations (Princeton University Press, 2016).